Unique Piece

A glowing curtain rod bathes in light the draped fall of an old satin fabric. The light sheds over the softness of its satin sheen and the roughness of its mended scars. The piece is all made with recovered elements: two ropes sustain the horizontal LED light tube that holds a satin curtain with hand-darned tears.

Inés Sistiaga

University professor as well as independent designer, her portfolio includes projects both in collaboration with other creators or institutions and on her own. In parallel, she evolves as a textile researcher and knit programmer, and offers consultancy on creative projects.

With her work, mostly focused on the exploration of materials and textile structures, she develops studies ranging from the functional to the aesthetic and from the technical to the decorative. Through trial-and-error processes, Inés explores visual languages and material constructions by mediating artisanal and digital technology.

For Sistiaga, textiles are a tool. Her research is materialized in proposals within the field of Design and Interior Design.
